

Origins

The study of origins has always been most interesting to me. It doesn't really matter the topic. Origins fascinate me because they all deal with firsts.

From when I was a child to this very day, when reading about newly discovered canyons and caves, mountains summited or simply anything discovered in nature that was previously unknown or a feat that was unaccomplished, it would make me a little sad. Why? I wanted to discover something. I wanted to be the first person to climb something. I used to think that by the time I reached an age that I could go explore the world myself, that everything worth finding would have already been found.

Now that I'm old enough to explore things for myself, I'd rather not waste time looking for something unknown and instead visit the really neat places that have already been found. My dreams of finding something first or doing something first didn't go away, instead, the spirit of my ambitions have simply been redirected.

It has been a real pleasure getting ready for the Sunday sermon this week, particularly because the study has been an origin study. Through teaching the Bible I get to explore things I've never explored before, and that's better than finding a hidden canyon.

This week I have been studying the origin of justice. Where did the idea of justice come from? How did mankind first get an idea of how God defines justice? I've heard the topic of justice preached a few times and referenced many more, but I've never been part of an origins of justice study. It's been like exploring an unknown valley, but much more rewarding.

This week our journey will begin in the Garden and end at the Cross.

Much love,
